

Game: Adventurer's Guild

Members: Chris Yost, Nathan Rodarmel, Cougar Fischer, Grace Haslam, Maya Pellegrini

To conduct this evaluation, we checked the gameplay video the team posted to understand the idea behind the game as well as special instructions. After this, we also booted up the game to get a feel for it. There seem to be a lot of compiler warnings.

The cutscenes are quirky and add intriguing context to the story, it's pretty cliché but that was probably intentional. Backstory is set up really well with Bob wanting to quit his job because the company decided to ban laughter and joy. We're not entirely sure how the dungeon setting goes into the backstory, gameplay and overall design. The assets used are well-done and work well together.

The main character is pretty awesome, but animating a 3rd person player is pretty difficult. 1st person POV tends to be easier to complete. In a 3rd person dungeon, it typically makes more sense to set the camera to fixed follow. The controls made sense but felt weird at times. When adjusting the view, the camera would clip beneath the ground. There were also instances where you would need to look with the camera at a certain angle in order to move a specific direction. The enemy animations and flashes are super well done as well. The big size of the rooms make combat super easy, tightening up the playspace would make it not only more straightforward, but add decision-making challenges to future levels. The decorations and side rooms are also really well done. Escaping the dungeon made me want to continue to see what's on the other side!

One thing that we think would make a great addition to the game is audio. There wasn't any music, attack sounds, environment sounds, etc. Having audio would make the game much more immersive and unique.

Overall, there are a couple of fixes that could be done and some debugging, but the game was fun and the story was interesting.